For the study, psychologist Yujie Wu at the University of Michigan and colleagues surveyed more than 3,600 American adolescents between the ages of 12 and 17. They asked the teens questions about how they talked to their best friends, and whether those talks were super- or side-focused. The authors wanted to see if the same distinctions could be applied to young people's other relationships, such as with parents or with same-sex peers. It turns out the answers were very similar. Wu and his colleagues found that about 90 percent of teens think their friends are the people with whom they should be most emotionally invested. And, in fact, they are. "People usually think that teens should focus on their friends," Wu told LiveScience. "But we have this data that says that they're not." Indeed, the more-important "friends" teens think about, the worse they do in school. However, teens think of their parents differently, with about 70 percent of girls and 55 percent of boys thinking of their parents as their primary source of emotional support. "A father's paycheck is what's keeping the household together, and kids know that, and it's a role that they take seriously,"
