If I submit either form, it says "Error: Bad request". My directive does not have access to the other form, but it works fine when I use two directives that have both forms on them. These forms are injected into the directive's isolate scope; so they can't access each other's scope. How can I get my directive to be able to submit either form on the page? A: To start with, the behavior you're getting is normal. A directive is one expression away from its root, and that one expression contains a form. It's only when it's rendered on the screen as HTML that the attribute, the name, will be bound to a property of that expression. To get around this, you need to use a property directive. The Angular documentation explains this in detail here. As far as using different forms on the same page goes, you can submit the form from another controller with the ng-submit attribute. Energy Savings 9 Reasons Why Fixtures and Equipment Affecting Energy Efficiency Top 9 Tips to Investing in Energy Savings By Brian Loughlin In 2017, the average American household used 11,158 kilowatt-hours of energy. The rest of the world came in a close second at 11,174, with China and India rounding out the top three. With the increased environmental pressure in the world's most populated country, more people are looking for ways to curb household energy use. Home improvement is one of the most cost-effective and predictable ways to lower energy consumption in a home, as 0cc13bf012
