The purpose of this study was to assess the cost effectiveness of carotid stenting (CAS) versus carotid endarterectomy (CEA) by performing a cost-effectiveness analysis from a US payer perspective. Cost-effectiveness analysis was performed using decision analysis to estimate the costs and quality-adjusted life years (QALYs) of each treatment for symptomatic patients with carotid artery stenosis in North America. The costs of CAS and CEA were considered for both stroke and myocardial infarction events and were discounted at 5% per year. Each risk was calculated using published probability data. Uncertainty in the model was accounted for using a probabilistic sensitivity analysis (PSA). The incremental cost per QALY gained was $24,311 for CAS and $27,964 for CEA. The PSA demonstrated that the cost per QALY gained of CAS was significantly less than that of CEA. For 100% asymptomatic patients, the PSA also demonstrated that the cost per
