In earlier versions of Photoshop, you could only add comments to files or previews. With Lightroom, you can set a due date for comment approval. That makes it easy to see whether you need to catch up on the comments before the due date passes. For comments, we've changed the wording to indicate the reviewer has or has not added a comment, depending on the due date that's been set, as you can see on the right. To keep the star rating clear from the progress of review, we added a new, more detailed star rating indicator, as you can see in the screenshot above. When you click over to the progress bar, you can see comment and rating information in plain view, as you can see above. There is also an option to display only comment and rating information, and a toggle to turn them on or off. The comment and rating banner is visible in both the Info panel window and the active layer view. The comment and rating information is available in the comments and ratings window, which can be toggled on and off. If you want to save a copy of your Photoshop document for review, just open a compatible version of Photoshop, open the document, and choose Save As. Choose Save As PNG. The file's name will have the comment date and time, as shown above, and a number in the file name, indicating how many comments have been approved. You can set a company name and other details that will appear in the comment field. This is identical to the dialog you see at the top of the file when you right-click an image in Photoshop.
